

New e-cig dangers revealed: Devices get 'more toxic with every puff', scientists say - as they spot two new carcinogens in the vapour

- Dangerous levels of 31 harmful chemicals are released during each puff
- Older gadgets are believed to be more damaging in terms of emissions
- Experts warn it doesn't mean e-cigarettes are safe at lower temperatures
- But the devices emit 6 times less of one chemical than ordinary cigarettes

E-cigarette devices could be releasing higher amounts of two toxic chemicals when they get warm, experts have warned.

Dangerous levels of 31 harmful chemicals can be inhaled from the devices – including two carcinogens that were previously unknown to scientists.

New research has found propylene oxide and glycidol are both emitted during every puff of an e-cigarette.

And older gadgets could be more damaging to someone's health than newer ones in terms of their emissions.

Dangerous levels of 31 harmful chemicals can be inhaled from e-cigarettes – including two carcinogens previously unknown to scientists

Tobacco giants are marketing e-cigarettes as trendy lifestyle accessories rather than quit-smoking aids, a major charity has warned.

Cancer Research UK, which usually promotes the use of e-cigarettes as alternatives to smoking tobacco, yesterday accused firms of misleading people with its research.

George Butterworth, campaigns manager at the cancer charity, said tobacco companies' track record means their research into e-cigarettes cannot be trusted.

He said: 'The tobacco industry has an appalling record of producing misleading research and distorting scientific evidence, historically around the addictive nature and health harms of smoking and more recently around the effectiveness of plain, standardised packaging.'

'Their business is selling a uniquely lethal product responsible for around 100,000 deaths in the UK every year.'

He added: 'Tobacco companies market e-cigarettes as a lifestyle choice as opposed to a method of quitting.'

Mixing cannabis with tobacco 'increases risk of addiction':...

Several major tobacco firms have entered the £4billion e-cigarette market as sales from traditional cigarettes fall.

British American Tobacco, for example, has ploughed money into its e-Voke gadget, which this year became the first e-cigarette to be given marketing permission for smoking cessation on the NHS.

Japan Tobacco International owns UK e-cigarette brand E-lites, and Imperial Tobacco owns Blu E-Cigarettes and Puritane.

The companies have also invested in research promoting 'vaping' as a safe alternative.

Mr Butterworth said: 'We don't condemn any researchers but Cancer Research UK has a clear policy to not work with those who are currently in receipt of tobacco industry funding, including from e-cigarette firms owned by tobacco companies.'

At least 12 scientific papers published in leading academic journals since 2013 have been written by employees of tobacco-owned e-cigarette companies or scientists sponsored by them, according to The Times.

The impact of these research papers has been hugely influential.

But researchers estimated e-cigarettes emit up to six times less of acrolein - which can severely affects the lungs and eyes - than ordinary cigarettes

Public Health England, in a landmark report published last summer, claimed that e-cigarettes are '95 per cent' safe - and called for the devices to be rolled out on the NHS.

That report was widely criticised when it emerged that its headline claim originated in research partly conducted by scientists funded by the e-cigarette industry.

E-cigarettes contain a liquid form of nicotine that is heated into vapour to be inhaled, avoiding the harm caused by tobacco smoke.

While most experts are agreed that vaping is far safer than smoking tobacco, many are concerned about unresolved safety concerns.

The World Health Organisation has warned that they may be toxic to bystanders and many rail companies have banned people from vaping on trains or in stations.

Europe's highest legal expert, Dr Juliane Kokott, the advocate general to the European Court of Justice, last year warned that e-cigarettes 'possibly cause risks to human health' and that they may even provide a 'gateway' for teenagers to go on to smoke tobacco.

In May this year all advertising for e-cigarettes or refills were banned on television, radio, websites, newspapers and magazines.

But billboard advertising is still permitted, as are posters on the sides of buses.

Around 2.6 million adults in Britain have used e-cigarettes in the decade or so that they have been on the market.

Health experts agree that the devices are much safer than smoking tobacco - and the gadgets are thought to have helped

VAPING: A 'GATEWAY' TO SMOKING

The health benefits of e-cigarettes have been dealt a blow by a study which warned they are a 'gateway' to tobacco and cigarettes.

Manufacturers and health experts have suggested vaping can cut smoking by persuading people to switch from cigarettes.

But evidence indicates many people who had never smoked are experimenting with e-cigarettes.

Researchers said around 1.5 per cent of secondary school pupils reported vaping in the past 30 days in 2011, four years after the devices first went on sale.

By last year this had soared to 16 per cent - or one in six pupils.

Just under a fifth - 19 per cent - of 17-18-year-olds admitted smoking in the past 30 days in 1995, dropping to nine per cent by 2004.

22,000 people quit smoking each year.

But others are concerned that non-smokers and children may be attracted to vaping by sophisticated advertising – and then go on to take up smoking as they become addicted to nicotine.

Public Health England last night insisted that e-cigarettes do far more good than harm.

Professor Kevin Fenton, national director of health and wellbeing at the organisation, said: 'Public Health

England will continue to monitor closely all the evidence on e-cigarettes and are committed to publishing an annual independent review at least until 2020.

'The evidence remains clear, with PHE's most recent review and the Royal College of Physicians both finding that while not completely risk free, vaping carries a fraction of the risk of smoking.

'While research is being done by industry, much of the evidence on e-cigarettes comes from impeccably independent institutions.'

Dr David O Reilly, scientific director at British American Tobacco, said: 'Many heads are always better than one. There needs to be more collaboration, not less.

'We believe our role in tobacco harm reduction is to create a range of less risky alternatives to traditional cigarettes that meet growing consumer demand and the varying needs of smokers looking for more choice.'

In 2014 the figure had only fallen to just eight per cent.

But the data also showed when cigarettes and e-cigs were combined, 14 per cent of pupils had used one or the other in the previous month.

Dr Jessica Barrington-Trimis, a research associate at the University of South California and lead author of the US study, warned vaping was 'eroding the progress made over the last several decades in tobacco control'.
